Supt. Knight was extremely gruff when questioned about Mullany's death this morning. At arise he refused to say anything at all, and the reporters who went to the works were told to get out. One of the employees of the company was talking to a reporter on the sidewalk when knight dragged the man away and shut the door in the reporters and away and shut the door in the reporter's face. Later the Superintendent made this statement:

"I don't know how it happened, I without foundation," he said. "There was a proposition of that kind both elbows, thus forming a current."

Beyond this nothing could be learned from the plant of the dynamo with both elbows, thus forming a current. Beyond this nothing could be learned from Knight, who then telephoned to Urdertaker William Connelly, of Lillo First avenue, whither Mullany's body had been taken, to let no one see the shorter foundation when the source of the said with the story. It had been expected that Mr. Childs would be present, but he did not appear. There was music by a quartet selected by Mr. John Hyatt Brewer, and then Dr. Talmage delivered a eulogy.

In his address Mr. Talmage reviewed Mr. Proctor's eareer from the time of his birth in Cheyne Row, London, fifty-six years ago to his death from disease engendered by long years of hard, unremitting work. He paid an eloquent tribute to the character of the man, who, although beset with an Iliad of wors after the loss of his fortune in the failure of a New Zealand banking corporation, devoted his life to the tender care of his family and the study of the heavens.
